eLearning-The way forward

As the world slowly reopens, schools do too. Education is an essential which cannot stop, come what may. But as the lockdown has forced us to stay home and forced schools to close; it calls into question: "Is the old way of imparting education relevant in these modern times?"

This topic has been hotly debated for many years and with the lockdown forcing almost all schools to switch to a method of eLearning, the results seem quite positive. eLearning offers a flexibility in education and attendance never seen before. The rigorous daily schedule of getting up early in morning, getting ready, waiting for a mode of transport or timing your arrival with precision to not be late has become unnecessary. This method of learning has cut down upon travel and schedule. Moreover, children can freely travel anywhere without missing a single day or period of their school. It removes the need for children to miss school for important appointments or function. Also, it makes children more and more comfortable with technology.

However, like every other thing, eLearning comes with its fair share with problems. It can lead to a lack of discipline which is essential in a student's life. It can lead to increased screen time which can lead to vision problems. It can also lead to negligence towards studies due to the lack of a personal touch.

All in all, eLearning has some pros and some cons. But with the world shifting to more electronic means, eLearning seems to be the best bet for education, moving forward. For present times, the best thing to do would be to introduce eLearning in a phased manner. For e.g.: A student can opt for eLearning if he/she has important appointments elsewhere. Also, if a child enrolled in a central board has, for some reason, to move to a different city or state, he/she can opt to learn from their schools until the end of the academic year, leading to smooth transition.

Education is the finest gift a person can offer themselves. And a proper education deserves the best of efforts from everywhere. It has to adapt and evolve as like every other essential. And eLearning is the way forward.
